

Liquid crystal displays

Liquid crystal displays work by blocking light by polarization, the same effect as rotating one lens of a pair of polaroid sunglasses in front of the other. A small electric charge across the two bits of glass changes the polarization of the liquid crystal in between and blackens the display.